A. Wild geese often fly in a V-shaped formation when moving to or from their breeding grounds in the north. This arrangement gives each bird room to flap its long wings, which span up to five feet. It also provides an almost unobstructed view straight ahead. Because its eyes are on the sides of its head, a goose can see the other geese more easily when flying in a "V" formation. Geese follow a leader on their flights. They fly rapidly, honking loudly. Migrating geese fly both day and night, stopping only to rest and feed.
